Under a grey ceiled sky, Among the chink and stir and worry of life in the kitchen, Where fire flashes in furniture, and stars in a copper pan, Winked and went out with the warmth, They watched from their narrow cages, with sparkling bead eyes, The coming and going of days, the set and the rise Of the fire. Grown sleepy and wise, They blinked with their heads on one side, While the days drew to weeks; Or sobbed, burying in little puffed breasts twittering beaks; Forgetting the whisper of leaves, the music of rain, Remembering the moon as an old clock face in the corner, Sleeping when sleep was a horror, and waking a pain, Under the crouching clouds of the low grey ceiling.
