Long time were greeting hands entwined, Long time they cheer'd the social board With many an earnest question kind, And eager answer freely pour'd. But when the sun's great heat was quell'd Beneath the western ocean's wave, The stranger's hand the exile held, And led him to the forest-grave. There, while the round moon rose afar, Making the listener's face look pale, While, one by one, broke each bright star Unmark'd, he told his simple tale. Green grow the valleys of the west, Bright bound the streams of dark Tyrone, There are my father's bones at rest, Where I shall never lay my own. Here drowsy Nature lies asleep, Crush'd by her own abundant treasure, But...
