Justice to the patient, and reason, indicate the vicious effect of accepting the lay anesthetist, and forbid our acceptance of this easier way. Hy. Alexis Thomson, professor of surgery University of Edinburgh, says: Like other branches of medicine, adequate study as well as practical experience is required in order to master the art of administering anesthetics. It is inconceivable how any question should arise about administering anesthetics being one of the most important branches of medicine. It is conceivable that a nurse may be trained to do fairly well anything, any one thing, that the most competent surgeon or physician does. Granted this, is it a good thing for the patient, for the nurse, for the physician or for the public to encourage her to constantly engage in the practice of any branch of medicine The late Sir Frederic W. Hewitt urged that Another reform needed is the appointment within our hospitals of an adequate number of officers for the special administration of anesthetics, possessing academic or professional qualifications similar in every respect to those required for other staff appointments at his particular hospital. Dr. G. A. H. Barton asks: What is the lure of anesthesia To my mind it lies chiefly in the variety of the work. The problems are almost endless; they arise from the state of the patient, the nature of the operation and the special demand of individual surgeons, all of which may be to a certain extent, ascertained beforehand. On the...
