RHIP - Rank Hath Its Privileges a. RHIP - Rank hath its privileges. True or false The answer is both. As responsibility increases, it is both normal and commonplace that the system provides for eliminating trifling, time-consuming annoyances. If an Eisenhower is commanding an Allied invasion of Europe, it is not unreasonable for him to have someone to plan, prepare and serve meals or to get a uniform clean and ready to wear. An officer should never forget that privileges to senior officers free their hands for their primary duties. There is, of course, another side of the matter. When people are successful, they usually expect and appreciate the good things in life. b. Retired Air Force Gen. Orvil A. Anderson started in the military by digging ditches. He noticed one day, while digging in the rain and wind, that there were few officers in the ditch with him and no aviation officers in sight. That was adequate incentive for him. He got out of the ditch and into Officer Candidate School. He went to flight school and wound up commanding the Air War College. Was privilege his primary motivation No ! It was getting out of the ditch and drying off. c. Except for proponents of the Japanese Theory Z style of leadership, most sectors of society provide some set of perquisites, or perks, to reward increased responsibility. It could be as simple as the Marines practice at one...
