So the geology of Dakota coal is not exactly fixed; but the deposits, I am inclined to think, belong to the Tertiary period. MODE OF OCCURRENCE. The general direction of the coal deposit in North Dakota seems to be north and south. The seams generally outcrop along the banks of streams or on the side of the bluff leading to a valley, the direction of which they follow. There may have been a general continuity of deposit, but it seems more likely that these different deposits were made in so many elevated Tertiary marshes. There are three seams distinctly noticeable, indicating a longer or shorter period of deposition, or a greater or less activity in vegetable growth, corresponding in each case to the thickness of the deposit. The lower seam...
